Abstract

The article is devoted to study and analysis of scientific works of M. V. Larin, who for more than 23 years directed the All-Russian Archival Science and Records Management Research Institute (VNIIDAD). The article reviews his earliest works on departmental agencies activities for improving state administration and records keeping in 1920s. This work, based on the study of archival documents (reports of the orgburos), concludes that a positive economic effect of improving state administration as a result of rationalization of records keeping is achievable, if supported nationwide. Later M.V. Larin addressed various aspects of document science and organization of paper work, yet always focusing on possible improvements by means of modern technologies. He studied researching and designing document support of management systems based on mechanization and automation of administrative work in 1980s. Later M. V. Larin analyzed methodology of information management and its applicability to paper work, which allowed introduction of records management in organizations. This research translated into M. V. Larin's doctoral thesis and his monograph "Records management in organizations." After the advent of e-documents M. V. Larin was among the first, who studied introducing electronic document flow and organizing e-documents storage in Russia and abroad. A number of now generally accepted principles for working with electronic documents in management were formulated then. At all times, when addressing improvement of paperwork management by means of recent developments in information technologies, M. V. Larin maintained that state regulation of records management, which provides a common information space for administrative system, is necessary.
